Here are a few entries for the acknowledgements section, covering mainly those outside Carnegie who helped.

Literally hundreds of parents, students, teachers and state and local school administrators gave generously of their time and expertise, but some deserve special mention. We owe special thanks, first, to the 50 chief state school officers and their staffs for their contributions and insights without which a comprehensive national look at choice programs would have been impossible. Bert Giroux of the Cambridge Public Schools, Susan Schacht of the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston, Professor Charles Glenn and Kahris McLaughlin of Boston University, Bill Grippo and Dennis Clancy of the Franklin Township, New Jersey School District, Principal Barbara Strobert of Montclair, New Jersey, Julio Almanza of St. Paul, Minn., and Peggy Hunter of the Minnesota Department of Education, were among dozens who gave us the benefit of their knowledge about local choice programs.

Professor John L. Witte of the University of Wisconsin and Tom Fonfara of Wisconsin Gov. Thompson's office were always available to help keep us current on developments in Milwaukee. We are grateful to guidance counselor Bill Griffiths, school bus operator Bernard Hemmingsen and his sons, editor Carolyn Smith of "The Alden Advance," and students Michelle, Chris and Lara of Alden, Minn., for being so very generous to a stranger, likewise to the parents, principals, students and townspeople of Randall, Motley and Staples Minn. We thank six Montclair mothers who talked with us long into the night about what choice had meant to them and their children. In Massachusetts, State Senators Arthur Chase, William Bulger and their respective staff provided us with important perspectives, data and updates on that state's choice program, as did Kathy Kelley of the Massachusetts Federation of Teachers. Our thanks, also, to two old friends, Robert Terte of the New York City Board of Education and Roy Campbell of Teachers College at Columbia University for their wise counsel, and to Bette Weneck of Teachers College who helped us hunt through dusty boxes of archives on East Harlem and New York City test data. We thank New York City superintendents Anthony Alvarado and Anton Klein for sharing their insights into the politics of choice. We are indebted to Amy Stuart Wells of University of California-Los Angeles for helping us sort out some of the constitutional issues surrounding private school choice, and to Prof. Julie Underwood of the University of Wisconsin who provided crucial background into the legal issues of the Milwaukee choice plan. Finally, we can never repay the debt to John Falco, Director of Alternative Programs in East Harlem's District 4, who opened so many doors and gave so unhesitatingly of his time over many weeks and many visits to his proud district.

~~STAFF ACKNOWLEDGMENT~~

P.S. -- I would never presume to parcel out the thanks due to those inside Carnegie. Needless to say, there are all the obvious contributors like Mary Jean, Lois, Dawn, Jan, Hinda, Pat, etc., not to mention Bronx Bob. I'd be happy to detail what I think each of those folks did if that would be helpful to you. But for now I just want to bring to your attention a few contributions to the project that you might not be as aware of:

~~--You'll recall that Vito and Gene reviewed drafts in early stages.~~
Vito was especially helpful with advice on Cambridge and the Massachusetts state plan. Gene's ^{Macely's} work over 20 years on urban education and on East Harlem's program gave us valuable guideposts.

†-David Hasselkorn of the Rockefeller Foundation provided some initial guidance in setting the direction of the report.

▽-Sally Reed thoughtfully helped keep us abreast of choice developments in Illinois.
